Director's Statement

The Noir genre encompassed a specific strand of film which was very popular in the United States from 1940 to 1959. A tormented man, a crime and an impossible love, they were almost always at the center of those suggestive stories in which tough men gravitated, whisky, cigarettes and femmes fatale.

Noir was produced by Studios with big budgets but, for the first time in history, the first examples of indie American noir cinema were born thanks to the likes of Edgar J. Ulmer and Fred Myton, very poor but creative and productive people that were forced to quickly shoot one genre film after another to make ends meet. It can certainly be said that independent cinema has its roots in this genre of film and in these people who created a fresh and new cinema.

Works like Detour or Out of the past have really marked my existence and for this I decided to make a film that was a declaration of love for the genre American Noir but made by an Italian in the contemporary world.

To shoot this film, I used classic direction and a very clean aesthetic.

The film is full of directorial choices typical of film noir.

I used the same technical equipment (railroads; dollie; etc) of the past.

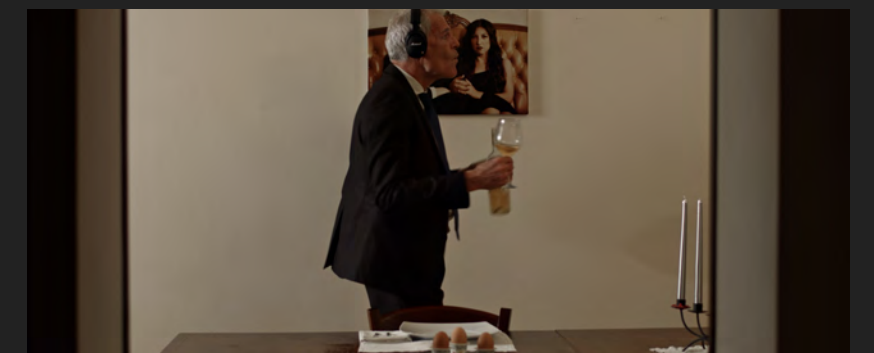

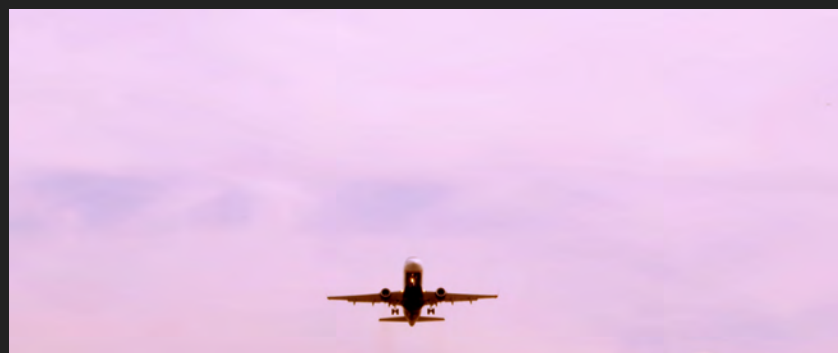

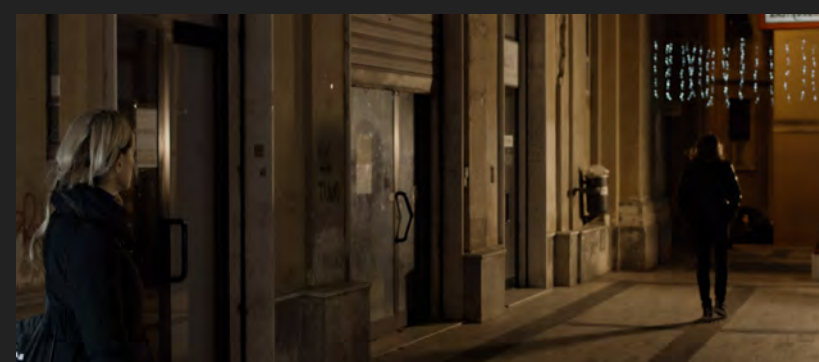

The choice of color compared to the classic black and white it allowed me to modernize the genre and make it more personal. Nonetheless, the classic stylistic features of Noir continue to be scattered everywhere, thanks to the acting of the characters, to the wonderful costumes, to the beautiful locations and vintage optics with which the film was made.

Enjoy Unlucky to Love You: The Italian Indie Noir!
